Surgery, Orthopedic Hand, Wrist, Elbow, and Shoulder

Dr. Evan D. Collins holds a faculty appointment at Weill Cornell Medical College and is one of the leading board-certified orthopedic surgeons specializing in hand, wrist, elbow, and shoulder in Texas. He is recognized for his work in carpal tunnel syndrome, tennis elbow, Dupuytren's disease, and osteoarthritis - specializing in endoscopic carpal tunnel release, percutaneous needle fasciotomy (PNF), injection therapy, arthroscopy, and joint reconstruction. His work is published internationally in medical journals and educational resource guides contributing to new, less invasive treatment options for common tendinopathies and degenerative joint conditions. Through his research and extensive work in hand and upper extremity, he has advanced the medical community's understanding of injuries and conditions affecting the small bones and joints of the hand, wrist and elbow - improving patient care and outcomes.

Formerly the director of the Hand Fellowship at Baylor College of Medicine, he is among the Methodist healthcare teams serving professional musicians and athletes across Houston.
